
Risk Management Briefing

July 2011

26 Store Street
London
WC1E 7BT
Tel: 020 7399 7400
Fax: 020 399 7425

Guidance on the Bribery Act 2010

Introduction

The offence of Bribery has existed for a considerable period in the UK, but has proved difficult to enforce against businesses where the commission of the offence occurred overseas. As a consequence, the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development pressed the UK Government to bring the law more up to date, so that UK law could be used as a instrument to tackle and punish bribery wherever in the world it occurred.

The Bribery Act 2010 will enable prosecutions to be more easily brought within the UK, when it comes into force on 1 July 2011.

While many companies will feel that they already conduct their businesses in an ethical manner and may already reflect this in a publicly-expressed policy and/or an internal code of conduct, the Bribery Act imposes, indirectly, a more wide-ranging obligation. In doing so, the Act seeks to create a new ethical environment under which all businesses need to operate effectively their own anti-corruption procedures.

The new law is controversial because, in some respects, it creates higher standards for commercial organisations subject to it than other countries' laws, thus potentially creating a competitive disadvantage. The Act extends strict criminal liability to a commercial organisation that fails to prevent those associated with it – for example, its employees, subsidiaries, agents and business partners – from engaging in bribery. If such bribery occurs, the business can defend itself from prosecution only by demonstrating that it operated anti-corruption procedures. The law applies to any commercial organisation that conducts any part of its business in the UK.

The onus will be on all commercial organisations with a UK connection to operate anti-corruption procedures, and extend them beyond their own businesses to those with whom they conduct business.

This guidance note explains:

- i. The new offence of “failing to prevent bribery” under section 7 of the Act which aims to create this ethical environment; and

- ii. What the UK Government expects businesses to do in devising and implementing anti-corruption procedures. This is contained in Guidance issued by the UK Ministry of Justice.

At the end of this note are listed some additional sources of information which will aid those businesses seeking to establish, review or update their anti-corruption procedures.

New Offence Concerning “Associated Persons”

Failure to Prevent Bribery Section 7(1) of the Act provides that a relevant commercial organisation is guilty of an offence if a person associated with it bribes another person, intending to obtain or retain business or a business advantage for that commercial organisation. The offence can be committed in the UK or overseas.

This is of particular concern to businesses as they may be held to be accountable for the actions of persons associated with them, not just their own employees. So, it is not enough for a business to feel confident about how ethically it runs its own business. It needs to have that confidence about those “associated persons” with whom and through whom it conducts its business.

In the Act, an “associated person” is defined as one who performs services for or on behalf of the business (section 8(i)). The meaning of “performing services” is vague. The Act states that it will be determined by reference to all the relevant circumstances. However, it is clear that it can cover those that provide services to the business (e.g. advisory services outside the normal field of operations of the business) as well as those, like sub-contractors and sub-consultants, where the business has delegated the performance of its own functions.

The effect of the section 7 offence is that where “services” are carried out by a third party on a company’s behalf, it will need to ensure that the third party is: aware of and commits itself to the company’s anti-bribery policies; made aware of and adopts ethical standards of business and subject to appropriate due diligence and monitoring. That is to state the requirements at their most basic level. Depending on the perceived level of risk of bribery, the requirements may well need to be considerably more sophisticated, as is explained below under the heading “Adequate Procedures”.

Defences to a Prosecution

Under section 7(2), a company prosecuted under section 7 has a defence if it can show that it had in place ‘adequate procedures’ designed to prevent bribery. These procedures are introduced in section 9 and are explained by the March 2011 guidance, issued by the Ministry of Justice (“the Guidance”) <http://www.justice.gov.uk/guidance/docs/bribery-act-2010-guidance.pdf> Proportionality is emphasised. The benchmark for compliance with the procedures will be lower for small or medium sized organisations with more limited resources. This theme of proportionality is often repeated in the Guidance in a deliberate attempt to allay fears that every business, whatever their size, will become tied up by unnecessary internal bureaucracy and additional cost in seeking to comply with the Act.

So, what does the Guidance say commercial organisations need to do to devise and implement anti-corruption procedures that are going to meet the required standard of “adequate procedures” and thus provide a defence under the Act?

“Adequate Procedures”

The Guidance sets out a series of principles which it suggests businesses follow:

1. Risk Assessment: Companies should regularly and comprehensively assess the nature and extent of bribery risks associated with their market. Internal risks such as deficiencies in employee knowledge and training should also be monitored. Only adequately skilled persons should undertake the assessment, so external risk assessment professionals may need to be considered in larger organisations, although this is not compulsory.

Ongoing risk assessment should occur over the following areas:

- Country Risk: Corruption league tables and the presence of anti-bribery legislation should be considered.
- Transaction Risk: Transactions at a high value or political contributions may involve a high risk.
- Partnership Risk: These include transactions with public office holders in higher-risk jurisdictions.

Practical Implementation: The following steps are recommended by the Guidance:

- Simple internet searches to find out about the levels of corruption or bribery in the relevant geographical location.
- Consultations with UK diplomatic posts or UK Trade and Investment <http://www.ukti.gov.uk/home.html> , or business representative bodies here and in the relevant country for up-to-date local knowledge.
- Viewing the Business Anti-Corruption Portal (aimed at small and medium sized businesses involved in overseas trade) <http://www.business-anti-corruption.com/>.
- Reconsidering the effect of any bonus or commission system that rewards staff or agents for excessive risk taking.

The Guidance mentions that there is no obligation on businesses to employ an external adviser to help in assessing the risks that may be faced, what procedures should be adopted and what due diligence should be undertaken. No external verification of the procedures put in place is necessary, although adequate and appropriate documentation of the risk assessment and its conclusions should be made.

2. Top Level Commitment: Top-level managers (for example directors or owners) should foster a 'culture of integrity' in which bribery is never acceptable. These managers should be personally involved in developing and disseminating a code of conduct and a zero tolerance policy towards bribery. The policy should be clearly articulated both internally to all levels of the workforce and externally to any external agents, consultants or distributors. The publication of a statement of commitment to counter bribery should warn employees of the risks and consequences of breaching the policy.

Particular attention should be given to the selection and training of senior management, engagement with relevant associated persons and external bodies such as sectoral organisations. Feedback should be given to the board on levels of compliance.

3. Due Diligence: Due diligence is required to enable the organisation to accurately identify bribery risks associated with all parties to a particular business relationship and all markets within which the organisation operates. Relevant parties include the organisation's supply chain, agents and intermediaries and all forms of joint venture. Three main areas of focus for due diligence are listed:

- I. Location (Country Risk);
- II. Business Opportunity (Transaction Risk); and
- III. Business Partners (Partnership Risk).

Practical Implementation: An approach proportionate to the size of the business is emphasised by the Guidance:

- Businesses need only do due diligence on persons who will actually perform services for them, or on their behalf.

- The level of due diligence required will depend on risk assessment. If the risk of bribery is low then a business need only be satisfied that the party performing services for them is genuine and trustworthy.
- High risk business partners may be inspected by viewing financial statements, accounts references and individual's CVs.
- Where a business relationship exists with an associated person of high risk there should be due diligence and monitoring both before and after contractual agreements are entered into.

4. Communication: Organisations must communicate anticorruption policies and procedures to employees. The policies must be clear, accessible, enforceable, and documented.

Scope: Policies and procedures should take into account the roles of the whole work force, from the owners and board of directors to all employees, people and entities over which the commercial organisation has control. The policies should cover matters such as political and charitable contributions, gifts and hospitality, promotional expenses, facilitation payments and "whistle-blowing".

Specific procedures: Specific procedures may involve modifying sales incentives to give credit for orders where bribery is suspected, implementing 'speak-up' procedures to allow any employee to report allegations of bribery in a confidential manner and designating a senior manager to deal with incidents of bribery in a prompt, consistent and appropriate way.

Effective Implementation: A program must be effectively implemented and embedded through all areas of the business, from recruitment to training. Policies and procedures must be 'implemented through the allocation of roles and responsibilities and by setting milestones for delivery'. For larger organisations, examples of effective compliance include continuing implementation of strategies such as training and monitoring compliance. It is also advisable to publish externally the company's zero tolerance attitude to bribery.

Practical Guidance: The Guidance makes the following qualifications:

- There is no need for extensive written documentation or policies, particularly in small businesses. Proportionate procedures may already be in place through existing controls over company expenditure, accounting and commercial or agent contracts.
- In very small businesses it may be enough to provide simple oral reminders to key staff about the organisation's anti-bribery procedures.

5. Monitoring and Review: An effective compliance program requires on-going maintenance and review in order to ensure compliance with policies, identify issues as they arise and make improvements. Larger organisations should put auditing and financial controls in place and regularly report to the Audit Committee or Board of Directors. Independent, external reviews of company procedures are recommended, particularly during any structural change or entry into a new market. These reviews may also be useful in identifying areas for improvement.

Practical Guidance: Staff surveys, questionnaires and feedback from training can provide an important source of information for the continuing improvement of anti-bribery policies. Internal financial control mechanisms may also be valuable in large organisations. Periodic reviews and reports from and to top-level management should be part of the internal procedures.

6. Record Keeping: The Guidance itself does not give much emphasis to the importance of keeping records of the risk assessments and due diligence carried out. However, it will be essential for businesses to be able to demonstrate compliance with its own published procedures if and when an incident occurs. In such a situation, the business will be expected to cooperate with investigating bodies and their willingness to do so will influence the decision of the Serious Fraud Office in deciding whether to proceed with a prosecution [see the information from SFO in the links listed below]. Having the records to show what efforts were made will be vital in this and in putting forward a defence, should a prosecution be brought. The business will need to decide in what location and on what media these records should be kept and appropriate checks made to ensure that the appropriate office has complied with these requirements.

Information Available

The task for each business to review and implement procedures will no doubt be a time-consuming one. The Guidance, however, is a good starting point to understand what is expected. In addition, there is a substantial amount of material available for free online which will inform anyone tasked with devising, implementing or reviewing the procedures in their organisations.

This Risk Management Briefing is for information only, and insurance or legal advice should be taken to cover your particular circumstances.

This Risk Management Briefing is available at www.cic.org.uk/liability.

© Construction Industry Council 2011

Reproduction of this Risk Management Briefing is encouraged, provided that it is reproduced unaltered and in full and authorship is acknowledged.

This briefing was compiled by Michael Archer of Beale and Company Solicitors LLP. Tel: 020 7240 3474. Email: m.archer@beale-law.com. (4 May 2011)